Recently, at the NCAA tournament, we had the opportunity to hear one of wrestling's all-time greats, Dan Gable, speak about the need to promote our sport better. No one would disagree that this is true.

Wrestling does have many battles to fight to win more acceptance with the general public. Some of these are uphill battles, such as Title IX issues and program cuts at the collegiate level. Others are rather simple and manageable if each of us does his part. Each of us must do our best to help improve the public's perception of wrestling.

First, and foremost, coaches at every level from the PeeWee's to the Olympics, should be a shining example of what we
